

Shane and the Wolf:

Deep in the valley between two mountains, there was a school for boys. At this school the students learned to read and write; but they also learned hunting, fishing, archery, and all the things needed to live in the wilderness. The students were taught to respect school property and take good care of the equipment. The boys were encouraged to keep their desks neat, their book bin order, and their sports gear clean and organized.

One boy in particular was very careful with his things. His name was Shane, and he always treated the school property with the greatest respect. He washed off his fishing gear when he returned from the lake. He wiped down his bow and arrows after archery class. He would organize his books and school supplies each night before he went to sleep. The other kids teased him for being so careful, but he didn't pay any attention to them. He knew he was doing the right thing.

One day, the school headmaster came running into the classroom "Someone help!" He shouted. "There is a wolf outside, and it is attacking the younger children!" All the boys ran for their bows and arrows, but none could get ready fast enough except for Shane. His bow was hung right where it should be and his arrows were clean and sharp. While the other boys were scrambling to find their things, Shane was taking aim at the ferocious wolf. It took three shots, but Shane saved the lives of his younger classmates that day. He became quite a hero at the school, and was given an award for bravery and quick reaction. The other boys realized that if they had taken better care of their things, they too would have been able to help fend off the wolf. Nobody ever teased Shane again for being so careful with school property.
